

Promoting 21st Century Skills in English Language Learners

The world is growing and changing quicker than we think, yet many educational institutions have changed a little in the last 25 years. Apart from some technology, such as multimedia whiteboards and classroom apps, which is mostly teacher-centered rather than learner-centered and encourage memorization rather than cultivating thinking skills, classrooms still look, more or less, the same. For example, desks are organized in rows and columns, facing the teacher and pedagogic expectations and practices remain the same. This needs to be changed so that the pedagogy is more appropriate for the 21st century and involves teaching skills that promote critical thinking, collaboration, communication and employability.

In this session we will look at the research to learn about the skills that our students need for their future, and how we can develop them through our pedagogical practices.
